Scheduling: Paving the Way 📅

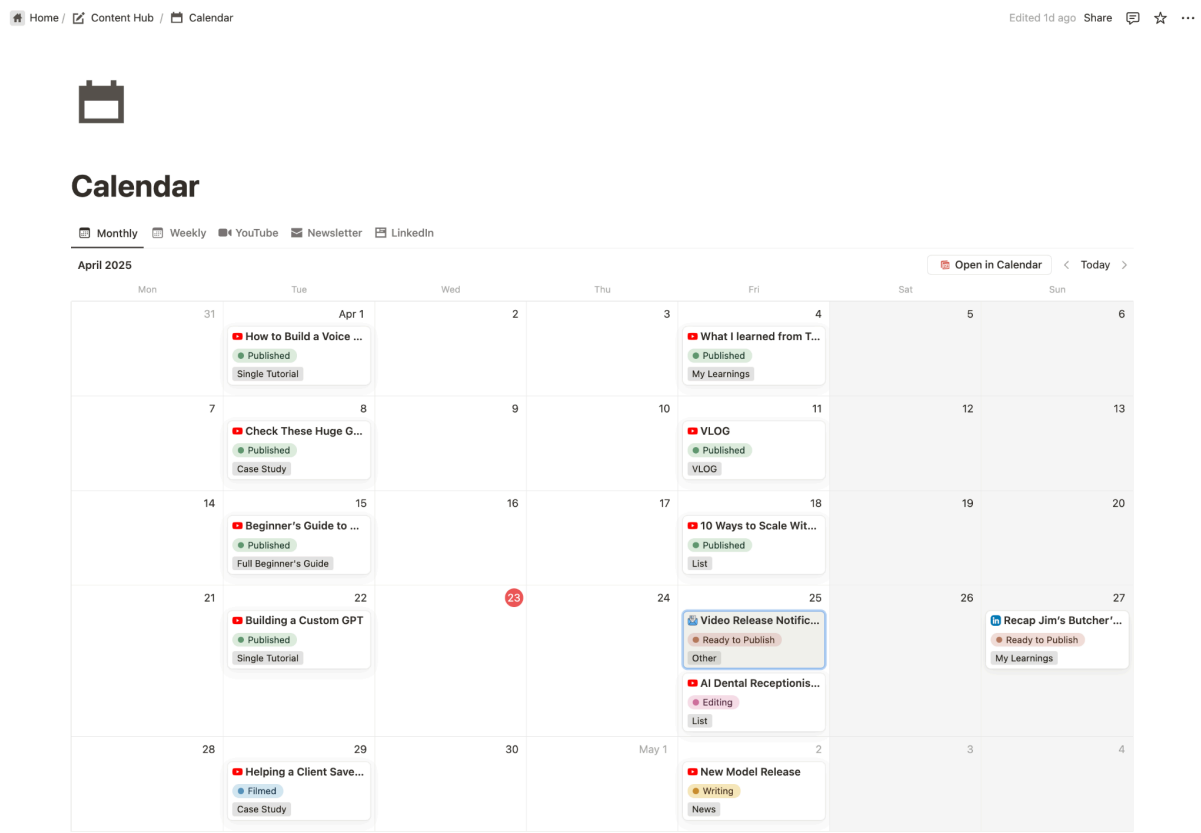
Your content calendar is the heartbeat of your YouTube channel. Here's how to set it up effectively:

Publishing Frequency ⏰

For AAA owners starting out on YouTube, I recommend starting with 2-3 videos per week depending on how busy you are with other commitments. This balances:

- Algorithm benefits (consistent uploads)
- Quality standards (enough time per video)
- Realistic time commitment (sustainable long-term)

As your skills and systems improve and you potentially build a team, you can increase frequency—but consistency always trumps quantity.



A solid 2x per week content calendar.

Content Accordion Strategy 🪗

The Content Accordion strategy, coined by Alex Hormozi, describes the natural oscillation between quantity and quality that successful content creators experience. Rather than seeing quantity vs. quality as a fixed choice, it's a dynamic process that expands and contracts like an accordion.

How It Works:

1. Start with quantity focus - Create a high volume of content to build skills, test what works, and gain momentum (e.g., posting 3-5 videos per week)

2. Analyze performance - Identify which content pieces perform best and what patterns emerge

3. Contract to quality focus - Reduce volume but increase quality by focusing on the winning formats (e.g., drop to 1-2 videos per week but make them exceptional)

4. Master the format - Once you've perfected your approach to these fewer, better videos you can then go back to testing other formats

5. Expand back to quantity - Scale up production of these high-quality formats (e.g., back to 3-4 videos per week but all in your proven format)

6. Repeat the cycle - Continue this accordion-like movement between periods of expansion (quantity) and contraction (quality)

Example:

Sarah starts her AI agency YouTube channel posting 3 videos weekly covering various AI topics. After two months, she notices her AI automation tutorials consistently outperform other content. She contracts to just one weekly video, focusing entirely on in-depth automation tutorials with better production quality. Once she masters this format, she expands back to 3 weekly videos—all high-quality automation tutorials—generating triple the leads while maintaining the quality standard.

IMPORTANT TAKEAWAY 🔑

The key insight is that there's no permanent "right answer" to how much content you should create—it's a dynamic process that should expand and contract based on your resources, results, and the feedback you receive.

Buffer Management ⚠️

As we covered in the Consistency 101 module, maintaining a content buffer is essential for sustainable content creation. This buffer isn't just a nice-to-have—it's the foundation of a stress-free, consistent YouTube strategy that can weather life's inevitable disruptions.

I learned this lesson the hard way. For nearly a year and a half, I was creating content at the last minute, constantly rushing to meet deadlines. The stress was immense, and it almost derailed my content strategy several times. What saved me was finally committing to building and maintaining a proper buffer.

A content buffer serves several critical purposes:

1. Consistency insurance: When life happens (illness, travel, emergencies), your publishing schedule continues uninterrupted
2. Quality improvement: Without the pressure of immediate deadlines, you can create more thoughtful content
3. Strategic flexibility: You can respond to trending topics or opportunities without disrupting your schedule
4. Mental peace: The psychological freedom of knowing you're weeks ahead is invaluable

The delays in your content pipeline will almost always come from your end as the creator required to plan and film content, rather than from editors or other team members. That's why your buffer focus should always be on ensuring you have FILMED & UPLOADED videos ready for your editors to start on.

The BARE MINIMUM buffer you should have is 2 WEEKS, though I personally aim for 4 weeks. This means you always have waiting at least:

- 2x videos ready to edit if you're on a weekly upload schedule
- 4x videos ready to edit if you're on a bi-weekly upload schedule
- 6x videos ready to edit if you're on a tri-weekly upload schedule

This Notion system is designed to help you and your team clearly visualize your buffer status, showing exactly how many videos are filmed and ready to edit and publish at any given time.

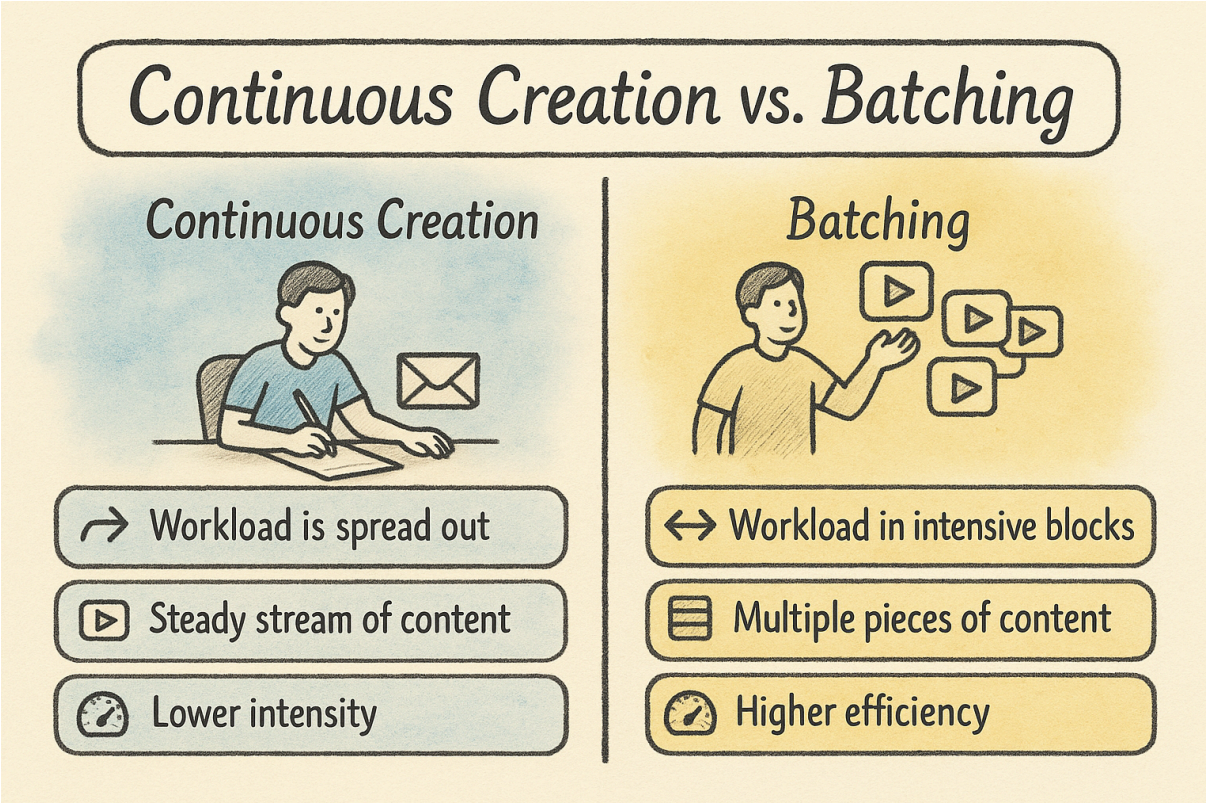
Batching vs. Continuous Creation 🍞

There are two primary approaches to building and maintaining your content buffer, and choosing the right one can dramatically impact your productivity and peace of mind.

- Continuous Creation is when you spread your content creation throughout the month, dedicating a portion of each day or specific days each week to planning, filming, or editing. For example, you might film every Tuesday and Thursday, creating a steady stream of content.

- Batching is when you concentrate your content creation into intensive blocks, creating multiple pieces of content in a single session. For example, dedicating the first week of each month entirely to content creation to produce all of that month's videos at once



One of my hardest-earned lessons over the past two years has been discovering the power of batching over continuous creation. My current approach is to have a dedicated "content week" at the start of each month where I:

- Set up my filming environment once and keep it ready
- Plan & write 1-2 of my own scripts
- Do a final review of scripts written by my script writer (1-2 simple videos per month)
- Film all videos for the entire month in concentrated sessions (1-2 filming days)
- Upload everything to my content system for my editors

By the end of the first week, I have the entire month's content completed. This gives me three full weeks to focus on other aspects of my business that I'm passionate about—strategy, client work, team building, and growth initiatives.

The benefits of batching over continuous creation include:

- Reduced context switching: Your brain doesn't have to constantly shift between content mode and other work
- Technical efficiency: Setting up lighting, camera, and audio once saves hours each month
- Creative momentum: Ideas flow more naturally when you're in a creative state for extended periods
- Mental freedom: The psychological relief of knowing your content is handled is immeasurable
- Strategic focus: With content handled, you can think bigger about your business direction

This batching approach naturally creates a 3-4 week buffer, serving as insurance against unexpected events, technical issues, or opportunities that require your immediate attention.

If you're just starting out, continuous creation might be more manageable as you learn the ropes. But as soon as you've established your basic workflow and team, I strongly recommend transitioning to a batching approach. Start small by batching just 2-3 videos at once, then gradually work toward the full "content week" model.

FYI: I know a guy who batches 20+ videos per month…There are levels to the game.

The combination of a solid buffer and an efficient batching strategy has been transformative for my business and mental health. It's allowed me to shift from being constantly stressed about the next video to being a strategic business owner who happens to create content.

Key Takeaways 🔑

1. Maintain a 2-Week Content Buffer: Always have at least 2 weeks of filmed content ready for editing to ensure consistent publishing despite disruptions and reduce stress.

2. Implement the Content Accordion Strategy: Oscillate between quantity (testing what works) and quality (refining successful formats) based on performance data rather than sticking to a fixed approach.

3. Batch Your Content Creation: Dedicate concentrated blocks (like a monthly "content week") rather than spreading creation throughout the month for greater efficiency and mental freedom.

4. Start With 2-3 Videos Weekly: For AAA owners beginning on YouTube, this frequency balances algorithm benefits with realistic time commitments while building skills.

5. Focus on Filmed Content: The bottleneck is usually at the creator level (filming), not editing, so prioritize building a buffer of recorded videos ready for your editing team.

Action Items ✅

- ☐ Take 8 of the best ideas you came up with in the previous video and schedule them on your content calendar, change the status to ‘Scheduled’ rather than ‘idea’. Posting 2x per week on Tuesdays and Fridays is a good cadence.

- ☐ Set a recurring weekly event on a Monday morning to check over the content calendar to update the calendar (change statuses etc) and to add another week onto the end of your schedule (since you’ve just moved forward a week)
